Asteroid november 2020 name

Sandy Huffaker / Getty ImagesThe story is a bargain hunter's dream. A bonanza holiday shopping season of one-day sales and door-buster deals began this month. And both consumers and retailers eagerly predict and celebrate this event every year. But not everything will be marked at the best price of the year. So, if you're waiting to hit the prices, here's probably 11 things you won't buy this month, along with a few tips from experts on how to get the best of the shopping dollar. If Earth were in the cross-country targets of a killer asteroid, we wouldn't have had any luck, but NASA and ESA are preparing for the first technology test that could one day save the planet. The dual Asteroid Referral Test (DART) mission is set to launch in a few years, and now has a proper name for its goal. The little moonlet once known as Didymos B is now Dimorphos. Astronomers discovered Didymos in 1996 without knowing it would be the perfect target for testing NASA's asteroid guidance technology. Didymos passed close to Earth in 2003, revealing the presence of a small natural satellite in orbit. Didymos itself is less than a kilometer high, but its satellite is only 100 feet in diameter. After discovering the lunar let, astronomers changed the name of the Didymos object, which is twin Greek. The moon ended up stuck with the strange nickname Didymos B. DART is a mission around a kinetic effect - it will hit didymos B at high speed. This is an ideal way to test the impact of a collision because we can observe changes in its orbit around Didymos. This asteroid makes the satellite an important object and does not continue to call it Didymos B. The International Astronomical Union (IAU) eventually went at the suggestion of Kleomenis Tsiganis, a planetary scientist at aristotle university of Thessian and a member of the DART team. The name Dimorphos means two forms in Greek, reflecting the effect of NASA significantly changing the object's orbit. In 2022, the DART spacecraft will depart for the Didymos-Dimorphos system. The spacecraft weighs about 500 kilograms (Earth gravity is 1,100 pounds) and what will be almost no scientific payload mass. The solar sensor, star tracker and 20cm aperture camera will help you find the spacecraft and spank into Dimorphos 3.7 miles per second (6 kilometers per second). The Italian Space Agency will send a cube with DART, but it will snap before impact. This will allow scientists to track the immediate after then, but we will not find the full picture until the ESA Hera sends its mission to Didymos in 2024. Hera will be able to accurately measure the change in Dimorphos' orbit around Didymos. Analysis of the DART effect can tell us whether brute force is likely to deflect a dangerous space rock, and if so, how much warning we need to give to take it off course. We can also learn that this is not an effective way to protect the Earth. Better ideas of asteroid or a smaller rock or binding with a rocket.
